IN MEMORIAM.

[There have been few more beautiful poems than this written. It was on reading it, that Geo. D. Prentice said: "One might almost wish to die, if he knew that so beautiful a tribute as this would be written to his memory!"
On the bosom of a river,
Where the sun unloosed his quiver,
And the starlight gleamed forever,
Sailed a vessel light and free.
Morn'g dew-drops hung like manna
On the bright folds of her banner,
And the zephyrs rose to fan her
Softly to the radiant sea.

At her prow a pilot beaming
In the flush of youth dream'd,
And he was in glorious seeming
Like an angel from above.
Through his hair the breezes sported,
And as on the wave he floated,
Of that pilot, angel throated,
Warbled hope and love.

Through those locks so blithely flowing
Raid of laurel buds were blowing,
And his hands anon were throwing
Music from a lyre of gold.
Swiftly down the stream he glided,
Saw the purple wave divided,
And a rainbow arch divided
On his canvas snowy fold.

Anxious hearts with fond devotion
Watched him sailing to the ocean,
Prayed that never wild commotion
Might the elements might rise.
And he seemed some young Apollo,
Charming summer winds to follow,
While the water flag's carol
Trembled to his music sighs.

But those purple waves enchanted
Rolled besides a city haunted
By an awful spell that danted
Every corner to the shore.
Night shades rank the air encumbered,
And pale marble statues numbered
Where the lotus enters slumbered,
And woke to life no more.

Then there rushed with lightning quickness
O'er his face a mortal sickness,
And the dew in fearful thickens
Gathered o'er his temple fair.
And there swept a dying murmur,
Through the lovely Southern summer,
As the beautiful pilot came
Perished by that city there.

Still rolls on that radiant river,
And the sun unbinds his quiver,
And the starlight streams forever
On its bosom as before.
But that vessel's rainbow banner
Greens no more the gay Savanna,
And that pilot's late day manna
On the purple waves no more.

Written for the Patriot.
A WOMAN'S PRESENCE OF MIND.
BY MRS. LYLES.

We had laughed, and sang, and danced 'till we were tired, and at last, with one impulse, had thrown ourselves in a semi-circle at the feet of our hostess, begging for a story.

Mrs. F. was one of those rare women, who seem born to command respect and at the same time to win love. Richly endowed by nature, art and cultivation had done their utmost to make her what she now appeared, "A perfect woman nobly planned." She had gathered, as was her frequent custom, a party of young people round her to spend a month. As no one could act the part of hostess more charmingly, no one could more readily fill her home with pleasant guests.

On this occasion five young ladies and three young gentlemen had been invited, but early that afternoon the gentlemen had driven into town, and had been detained by a heavy rain, which continued with steadily increasing violence, so that we had little or no expectation of seeing them that night. However, we did not fear, for though Mrs. F. lived two miles out of town, and had no immediate neighbors, she had trustworthy servants, and, as she told us, had often staid alone with them at night.

"A story, eh?" said she in reply to our united request; "well, as you seem destined to be beardless this bitter night, I do not see in what better manner we can pass away the time;—for if my story does not prove to be very entertaining, it may at least have the effect of a narcotic and transport you all to the land of dreams an hour earlier than usual." Then followed the usual bustle of preparation when a story is to be told. Little Nellie Hyde tucked her dainty feet under her on a low ottoman—her favorite attitude when unrestrained by the presence of masculine—while her more dignified friend, Amelia Wyndham, lounged gracefully in an easy chair. Jennie West, Addie Mitchell and I arranged ourselves as our varying fancies dictated, and when all were satisfactorily disposed, Mrs. F. began her story.

She had just reached that thrilling point where the gaze of the listener becomes fixed upon the face, of the speaker.

Little Nellie sat bolt upright on her low seat with eyes distended and nerves high-strung with excitement, when suddenly she found herself enveloped in a huge shawl, unceremoniously tripped off her seat and rolled over and over on the carpet. At first she uttered a frightened scream and then a little smothered laugh; for she evidently, with the rest of us, considered the performance as only a practical joke on the part of Mrs. F., who sometimes descended from her dignity sufficiently to engage in such pranks. But what was our astonishment mingled with horror, to discover that what we had considered a mere joke had only just escaped being a fearful reality. When Nellie, after being rolled, tumbled, and beaten, and buffeted about by Mrs. F., was at last relieved of her huge covering, and lay panting and laughing on the floor, she exhibited to our astonished vision only the remnants and shreds of her light evening dress with a scorched and blackened petticoat. Silence-stricken we gazed at Mrs. F. for an explanation, while Nellie, comprehending at a glance the awful suffering she had escaped, flew fearfully frightened, now that all danger was past, into the arms of her preserver. With wonderful tact Mrs. F. soothed her, and gently explained how the accident originated. While we sat, wrapped in the interest of the romance, and oblivious to everything else, Nellie's dress, drawn out in a puff by the fire, to which she sat imprudently near, had caught and was in a blaze ere she discovered it. Knowing then that everything depended upon promptness and decision, she had instantly seized the shawl, which Nellie's own loving care had placed upon the arm of her chair in case she should become chilly, had thrown it round her and succeeded in keeping us all in darkness as to the accident until the danger was passed.

"What wonderful presence of mind!" we all exclaimed in a breath.

"Presence of mind!" said Nellie;—"oh how I envy you the possession of that faculty, dear Mrs. F. I am sure that I am not gifted with a particle of it. If I thought I was, I would almost wish that some terrible danger might threaten you that I could avert, as you did mine. But I am such a timid little goose that I am afraid all I should do would be to scream and frighten away the service of every one else."

"Oh, no, my dear; I am sure you underrate yourself, for I know of no one whom I would sooner risk to rush to the rescue of a friend than my little Nellie, with her warm heart and noble impulses. I believe your courage would rise with the occasion. But suppose I finish my story, for I left the hero in a very perilous situation, and it would be cruel not to relieve him."

We all knew that this was only a ruse for calming us, and withdrawing our thoughts from the recent threatened calamity. It had the desired effect for when we separated for the night there was nought in our manner to indicate that anything unusual had occurred, save that a tear stood in Nellie's eye as she gave Mrs. F. a fervent good night kiss.

We girls had habitually occupied two adjoining rooms on the second floor, communicating with each other by means of a large door, which we usually kept open at night.

Large closets in the rear of these apartments served as dressing-rooms, while smaller ones in the recesses of the chimneys served for wardrobes.

On entering our room Nellie walked straight to one of these closets, and as she opened the door I saw her give a sudden start and turn deathly pale; then, as if ashamed of her cowardice, she marched boldly forward, procured what she wanted, and coming out, gently closed the door. Afterwards, saw that her face remained pale, I noticed nothing unusual in her demeanor.

But just as we were all ready to jump into bed she exclaimed, as if the thought had suddenly occurred to her, "Girls, it is such a wretched shivery night suppose we all sleep in the same room. One of you can sleep on my little bed with me while the other three can lie spoon-fashion on the big bed. What say you?"

We all readily consented for indeed the project was rather agreeable than otherwise to us; besides we were in the mood to have gratified Nellie in any whim.

As Mrs. F. moved over to the other room I observed Nellie stand bolt upright and as my position commanded a view of the room, we had left I saw her quickly turn the key in the door, then as quietly that in the door leading into the hall, and she came through the door leading into the room we were to occupy. She noiselessly closed and locked the door, and looked at us.

Attributing these unusual precautions to nervousness arising from her recent and unwanted excitement I thought nothing of it at the time and was soon in the land of dreams.

When I opened my eyes next morning the first object that rested upon me was Nellie, standing ready dressed at the window which commanded a view of the road leading to town.

"For which one of the beaux have you risen so early, Nellie?" said I. "Is it Ned Stuart, the gallant Captain of Jimmie Alston's foot regiment? I know it is not for Albert Burgin, for he is a member of a special property."

Albert Burgin, by the way, was Mrs. F.'s nephew, a wealthy southerner, handsome, brave and generous, as are most of his race; the pet of all the ladies and the idol of his Aunt.

We had seen from the first that Amelia was bent upon his capture and so had contented ourselves with an equal division of the other two, giving each, as we laughingly agreed, half a bean apiece.

Nellie turned, slowly round as I addressed her, and smiling rather faintly replied, "I was awake when the sun began to rise and have been watching the frozen rain-drops sparkle in its rays; but see, how rapidly they are melting." It was indeed a sight to tempt one to rise early I admitted as I approached the window. The tall trees which lined the avenue were bending beneath their covering of frozen water, while every leaf and twig and hardy chrysanthemum and frost-defying zinnia glistened and sparkled in the sunshine like precious stones of varied hues by gaslight.

We remained gazing on the scene until the sound of the dressing bell disturbed the others, and then began the usual bustle and confusion of tongues, which needs no description to those who have seen a roomful of young ladies going through the operation of beautifying themselves.

After breakfast we repaired to the veranda to watch the arrival of the gentlemen who were soon rapidly driving up the avenue. As the little pony phaeton swept up to the steps with a flourish and the gentlemen sprang out, a chorus of merry voices greeted them. Mrs. F. rallied them, in her charming way, on their lack of gallantry in leaving a parcel of damsel all forlorn on such a night.

"I believe that Albert would have come through a storm of pitchforks and broadswords," said Ned Stuart laughing; "indeed, we forced him to remain by locking up Fairy. There certainly was a powerful attraction drawing him thitherward."

Amelia's vivid blush and pleased smile showed plainly who appropriated this compliment. While Ned was speaking I watched Nellie move quietly into the house and Albert, obeying an almost imperceptible motion of her hand, follow her. I heard the murmur of their voices from the parlor, seemingly in earnest conversation for a few moments; and then Nellie came out and went immediately up stairs, while Albert came to the hall door, and exclaimed rather excitedly, "Why stand ye loitering here?" and then with a nervous laugh, "Come, we must make ourselves more presentable." At this the young men followed him up stairs, and we ladies, left alone, wandered aimlessly about the parlor for a few minutes, when suddenly we heard, immediately above, a fall as of some heavy body, a suppressed scream and a shuffling of feet as if a struggle were going on. Simultaneously we rushed up the stairway, and Mrs. F. in advance of the rest of us, threw open the door from whence the sounds proceeded. I pause here to long for the thousandth time for the pen of the immortal Charles Dickens; for the scene which was presented to us, in its comic admixture of the tragic and the ridiculous, can be described by no other. One glance revealed Albert and Ned and Jimmie all in a heap as it appeared, upon the floor; but a longer survey showed, in their hands, and under their feet and lying about the floor generally—a man, long, thin and wiry, the grations of whose body, as he struggled to escape, reminded one of nothing so much as of an eel caught and entangled in the line of the disgusted disciple of old Isaac Walton.

The preceding genius of the scene seemed to be Nellie, who directed the others and at the same time buckled a trunk, strap round the victim's legs and another round his body, securing his arms. Surprise and consternation held us silent until this was completed, when with one simultaneous impulse, we all burst into a peal of laughter so long and loud that it drew the servants from all parts of the house, and their varied expressions of surprise and dismay as they appeared, one by one, upon the scene were too comical. But the crestfallen looks of the fellow soon brought us to our senses, and we turned to Nellie and the gentlemen for an explanation.

One source seemed necessary however, for I think we all comprehended now why Nellie had proposed our sleeping together that night before—

On going to the closet to procure her night dress she had discovered the man, or rather his feet, as they pressed from beneath the various articles of clothing, which adorned a rack—or, to use a term more familiar to landladies, a "close horse," one of the kind which can be folded and set away in a corner when not in use, and which was stretched diagonally across the closet and covered with newly ironed clothes. Those same feet we immediately recognized as belonging to a clerical book pedlar who had called the day before. The spectacles, the wig and the luxurious beard were minus; but we had no difficulty, with the aid of them peculiarly long and crooked feet, in identifying him with that individual. He had been ushered into the parlor just as Amelia was in the act of exhibiting to our admiring eyes a new set of jewelry which she had no suitable opportunity of displaying during her visit. With a greedy eye he had watched Amelia replace them in their casket, and had heard her carry them into the room above.

Afterwards, secreting himself about the grounds, he had watched his opportunity, and returning into the house, had hidden himself in the closet with the design of appropriating them, and perhaps other valuables also, and decamping in the night with his treasures.

Nellie's presence of mind had saved them—and him too. We were all loud in our praises of her coolness and courage. Ned Stuart avowed that a man could not have managed the affair any better; for which doubtless compliment we all thanked him with much impressment. Amid great laughter and merriment, more, no doubt, than the captive thought the occasion warranted, he was taken to town and safely lodged in jail. At his subsequent trial he was pronounced to be an old offender and Nellie received the liberal reward that had been offered for his apprehension. With this she purchased an eloquent water service engraven with all our names, and presented it to Mrs. F. as a token of our love and esteem for her.

The rest of us did not feel that we had any claim to be represented in the gift, but such was Nellie's wish.

At hers and Albert's wedding, which was celebrated some months afterwards at Mrs. F.'s home, we were all present, and if Amelia felt any chagrin at the loss of the handsome Southerner, she concealed it wonderfully, and was no doubt partially consoled by the capture, on the night of the wedding, of a rich and childless widower.

Addie Mitchell and Ned Stuart were united the following autumn, and Jennie West, and Jimmie Alston a few months later, while I alone am left to tell the tale.

Baron Munchausen in California.

The following is a very amusing and entertaining account, entitled, "The 'big talk' about the agricultural productions of the Pacific coast which one hears in those parts." It is a story of a man who has been in California for some time, and who has seen some of the most remarkable things that have ever happened in the State.

"Two weeks ago I started on a visit to the Yosemite valley. I arrived at the wharf a moment too late to get on board, and instead of waiting until the next day, I determined to go to Stockton on horseback. I accordingly crossed the bay to Oakland, or as it is better known, 'Little Redington,' procured a horse and rode over to the Livermore valley, where I stayed all night with a rancher, who was known in the valley as 'Clumps.' After that he became known as 'Clumps' after him that because he got rich by holding on to his money with a degree of fortitude not universal in the country. As my trip approached 'Clumps' asked me if I would like some eggs boiled or fried. I told him I would like some eggs, and that I would like to have them soft boiled."

"In a few moments there came Clumps and his wife, rolling, as was the size of a flour barrel, which he boiled in a short time in a large pot, and then set it up on end by means of a chair at the table. A hole was made in the top of the shell, and the egg was dipped out with a long handled ladle. I was astonished at the size of the egg and observed that his hands must be enormously large. 'By no means,' he replied. 'You will not be much surprised when I tell you, that one hen did not lay this egg alone; it took seven or eight hens almost a week to lay it. It was a joint stock production of the chickens, but still it is better than the individual responsibility.'"

"At breakfast the next morning we had more eggs, and then I went on the road to Stockton. I reached San Joaquin river at noon, and was ferried over in a unique-looking craft. The ferryman was a tugging, shabby, old man, I inquired, whether his ferry was profitable.

"Doesn't scarcely pay for the boat," he replied.

"Raising the boat?" I inquired, "what do you mean by raising the boat?" "Mister," said he, resting for a while on his oars, "you're a stranger in these parts, be'n't you?"

"I replied that I had 'not been long' in the country.

"Then," said he, pointing to the shore, "this here boat grewed in that pumpkin patch yonder?"

"Grewed in that pumpkin patch?" I exclaimed.

"Grewed in that pumpkin patch," on a pumpkin vine. Mister, this here is a pumpkin shell, cut in two. This patch is where it grewed."

"Where, over by that barn?" I inquired.

"That ain't no barn, he answered, 'unless you choose to call it so.' There's a pumpkin, too. But I made a mistake in the end out and let the stock inside, and when the wet season sets in, you see, I plug up the hole and let 'em winter there. They come out a'vul fat in the spring. That big green looking squash yonder yonder 'Pumpkin' 'int to live in."

"Are these the growth of the season?" I asked.

"We don't have no such difference here on the San Joaquin as growin' seasons and them others: things keep on growin' all the time till we pull 'em or they die."

"As I was taking leave of my host, he gave me a pumpkin seed; with the remark that I might astonish the folks in the East with it; but before twenty-four hours had elapsed I came near having a calamity by reason of it myself.

"It was in this wise: After riding several hours in the sun I was so over come by drowsiness as to 'nod' to and possible to keep in the saddle, and one morning, lay down on the ground, intending to take a short nap. I had the pumpkin seed in my pocket. During my slumbers it fell on the ground, and I rolled over on it. My great fatigue caused me to oversleep myself, and I awoke in the morning by being roughly hurried over the ground to my prostrate position, with what seemed to be a rope around my body, and howled lustily for help, and my wailing attracted the attention of two men who were on their way to the house field."

"On being relieved from my prostrate position the mystery became plain. The warmth of my body caused the pumpkin seed to sprout and begin growing, and one of the tendrils of the new vine had coiled itself around my body, dragging me along in the vine, growth a distance of more than half a mile before I was awakened. If the liverers had a hard run to keep pace with me in the clutches of the pumpkin vine, and finally arrested my progress by cutting it with their teeth. I gave them the vine for their reward, and we counted on it no less than three hundred young pumpkins, ranging from the size of a hen's egg to a flour barrel."

"There is but one more thing to tell you notice. Six years ago a gentleman residing near Stockton planted a vine by his house. In two years the building was completely enveloped in the branches of the vine, and the gentleman was surprised at seeing his dwelling starting from its foundations. The vine grew, with wonderful rapidity, and carried the house, unharmed, up to the height of six feet, in the air, where it remained. The gentleman now reaches his front door by means of a winding staircase around the trunk of the grapevine, and anybody who will take the trouble to go and see, will find it just as I have said."

"A Parlor Vine.—To grow a very pretty vine from the sweet potato. Put a tuber in pure sand or sandy soil, in a hanging basket, and water sparingly. It will throw out some beautiful leaves, and will climb freely over the arms of the basket, upward toward the top of the window. Not one visitor in a hundred but will suppose it to be some rare trailing plant."

all weak and lymphatic temperaments.

Spraying Animals.
Here to be operated on should have no food for at least twenty-four hours before hand. I use a stick about one and a half inches in diameter, eighteen inches long, a little crooked in the middle, to prevent it from slipping from side to side on pole or rail, on each end of this stick a strong string of soft leather of sufficient length to make a noose which is secured to each hind leg above the hock joints, then hang up and of course her head will be turned down and be out of the way; make an incision about two inches in length in the abdomen between first and second teats; from hind part of animal insert thumb and forefinger, when the ovaries are easily found where the womb unites with the body which are clipped off with a sharp knife.
I use in sewing, a needle about two and a half inches long, and two or three strands of shoemaker's thread twisted together and waxed with beeswax. I have been at the business for more than twenty years, and do not think I have lost one in a hundred. I pay no attention to zodiacal signs—have been noticing of late at the suggestion of a friend, and am inclined to the opinion that they bleed less when operated on at the new of the moon. I never spray in cold weather but never hesitate on account of heat or "dog days." Animals should always have access to plenty of water. Spraying greatly improves the flesh and they are much easier fattened.—Rural Carolina.

Farm Raking.—I commenced last fall a new extravagance, says the writer of the Ogeen Farm Papers, in the Agriculturist, "and I am satisfied that it pays well. I had hitherto wintered my young calves on the same food with the yearlings, and always succeeded in bringing them through the winter in tolerable condition—quite as good as the average. This winter I have given to each from half a pint to a quart a day of whole oats, and I am satisfied that they have grown as fast as they would have done on summer pasture. The growth too, is of a much finer character—in the bones they are thrifty and lusty without being fat, and I think have a better chance of becoming copious, bony cows and good milkers, than if they had received only the usual ration. Some of my neighbors have commented on their calves, and I observe the effect is very different from that of oats, producing less development of bone and more of fat—the opposite of what we want in milking stock."

Shed Running at Large.—The practice of allowing stock—cows, hogs, and sheep—to wander about the public roads is a troublesome and very wasteful one. A great portion of the value of the food of an animal properly fed and kept in yards is retained in the shape of manure, but if stock is allowed to wander at large all the manure dropped by them becomes the property of some long-headed farmer who keeps the road-drains and gutters open on his farm, so that he receives all the waste after every rain. A very noticeable cause of the poverty of the stock met with in districts where this custom is observed, is the promiscuous mixing up occasioned by allowing animals of both genders to run uncheckd. In such localities a farmer cannot tell when he can expect a calf or a litter of pigs, and often they come at most unseasonable times, and of very undesirable parentage. Thus, without order or system in this particular, and from want of care generally, the stock becomes next to worthless, and is hardly worth the food it consumes. Besides, it is very unfair to others who keep better stock, is generally unclean, and will occasionally get into fields not their owners, at times when their presence can do mischief which their owners can not repair. It would be better for all persons concerned that no stock should be allowed to run at large. In well-ordered and prosperous communities this practice is considered the reverse of proper or profitable.

Farm Stock.—This is the season of the year when stock demands the closest attention. If they are allowed through neglect, to lose flesh it will not be regained until summer comes, and the cost of keeping the balance of the winter will be kept up in good condition. Good shelter is indispensable. Water should be supplied in full quantity and of good quality. In a very large proportion of the stocks of cattle through the country, there is a grievous neglect in this particular. It is a great saving to cut the fodder for cattle, whenever it can be done and especially corn stalks.

Farm.—At this season of the year, but little farm work can be done. But the enterprising agriculturist will always find something to do on the farm. Wood should be hauled and prepared for summer use, so that no time need be lost when summer work demands year undivided attention. Material for repairing buildings and fences should be hauled to the place where they will be wanted. Procure fence posts, sharpen them and stand them out so that the sharpened end will become thoroughly seasoned before you put them in the ground, as the sap will hasten their decay.

How to Preserve Smoked Meats.—Take ground black pepper, the finer the better; wash all the mould or soil off from the hams or beef, and while they are damp, rub them thoroughly with the pepper. Two pounds of pepper will keep thirty pounds of meat free from flies or insects of all kinds. It is as certain as death that if the meat is in the smokehouse or wood house, and not a fly will approach it. It also improves the flavor of the meat.

NOTICE. I want to employ some smart business young man or boy to take charge of my horse and wagon. Will give him regular employment as long as he will attend to his business; pay fair wages. Must be of some action; must not have the motion of a terrapin; must be patient to me with snails. A boy of that action will not fill the bill. Also, one or two devoted, long tongued, empty headed, miserable sons of skunks can get regular employment to stroll about from wagon to wagon, tell people I am in Richmond, and not saying birds, children, or some sort of a thing of human form, can fill this bill. Will give him all he can make. I am fearful a certain little New-Englander got himself in on this bill.
